Research Interests

My research focuses on the ways emotion and emotion regulation are shaped by notions of the good and the moral in groups and cultural contexts. I see emotions as embodiments of group and cultural morality, and thereby as key processes of social cohesion. My research has spanned a wide range of topics, including the dynamics of cultural shaping of emotions, the spreading of emotions in groups, and emotional acculturation. It has shown that emotional fit and misfit has consequences for personal and social wellbeing, for acculturation outcomes, and for group outcomes. My research has led me to propose original theories of emotion, emotion regulation, and acculturation.
